in any of its branches to move or to get ready. As a matter of fact, we are ready with the little force we have, but it is generally understood by every member of this staff that there ought to be now an army of 250,000 men ready for any emergency, and there appears to be already an emergency in Mexico. The most startling consideration to us is that President Wilson knows that there is already an emergency or be there is already an emergency or he would have ordered the ships home from Mexico and the brigade of troops from Galveston."

A Cabinet officer said, in discussing the Mexican situation, that the policy of the Wilson administration was this, that President Wilson did not know what would be the effect in Mexico it he produced the slightest change in the status quo. He said that if Presi-dent Wilson recognized Huerta, the great revolutionary force in the field in Mexico would resent such action by the United States. If, on the other hand, he withdrew the troops from the Galveston and the ships from the coast, the Huerta party would see in it an open favor to the revolutionists. In both cases, the President could not act one way or the other, because he had not a sufficient army and Mexico could not be settled by the navy.

Expects an Answer.
This is the situation. It is believed a it exists to-night, as explained by that Cabinet officer:

He has informally notified the Foreign Relations Com-mittee of the Senate that he intends to move to discharge it from further consideration of his bill to repeal the neutrality act of last year, and will urge the Senate to adopt it. This, he says, will give the revolutionists an equal chance to everthrow Huerta and to move to discharge it from further consideration of his bill to repeal the neutrality act of last year, and will urge the Senate to adopt it. This, he says, will give the revolutionists an equal chance to overthrow Huerta and will aid in brinzing about peace.

"If we had taken a strong position when the Mexicans fired across the border and killed Americans, we would not now be confronting this situation." said Senator Fall. "The Mexicans then discovered that this government did not now be confronting this situation."

"The Mexicans then discovered that this government did not mean what it said. Prom that moment we lost its respect, and they believed we were afraid of them. The Mexican people to-day firmly believe the people of the United States are afraid of Japan, and they just as firmly believe we are afraid of them. that Cabinet officer:

Great Britain probably expects an answer from the United States as do the other nations in a short time, considering the gravity of the conditions in Mexico.

President Wilson, however, by sending for Ambassador Wilson, has substantially answered Great Britain in part, because, so, far as the public knows, President Wilson is sending for Ambassador Wilson for facts in which to base a reply to the foreign nations. By long odds, the Mexican situation is the most dangerous one that the United States has faced, since the trouble with the United States and Great Britain over the Venezueian boundary.
